Showdown at Darlington

"Name?"

"Doug Williams."

"Is Doug Williams your full name?"

"No. Douglas Wray Williams. That's Wray, W-R-A-Y."

"Date of birth?"

"Sept. 26, 1952."

"Place of birth?"

"Houston, Texas."

"Social Security number?"

"Two-six-six-one-nine-oh-eight-eight-six."

"Thank you, Mr. Williams."

"How will I know if I get security clearance.

There was a sort of laugh at the other end of the line. "Oh you'll know," the businesslike voice said.

Wonderful. I could see the 82nd Airborne Division storming my front porch, guns ablaze, planting Old Glory in the yard. And three days later I picked up my credentials for a not so magical but very mysterious tour with the man who wants you to be a part of his family, Jimmy Carter.

"I could have a gun in here," Faye Lee, an employe of Avis, said at her desk at the Florence Airport. "Nobody talked to me about anything. They should have. You don't ever know."

Which was rather odd. After all, not only was Democratic presidential nominee Jimmy Carter coming to town last Monday morning to attend the Southern 500 in Darlington, but also GOP vice presidential hopeful Robert Dole, Sen. Bob from Kansas, Jerry Ford's campaign hatchetman. There were a lot of dark glasses, a lot of whispering, a lot of earphones and a lot of fat members of the sheriff's department there. But nobody checked out Faye Lee. It turned out alright, though. Faye Lee didn't have a gun.

For a few short hours that day, Florence became something of a media event. The city was Carter's second stop on the campaign trail, which began in Warm Springs, Ga., and which he hopes will lead him to the White House. But it almost didn't come to pass. Carter, an avid racing fan, had planned to fly in, take a quick ride in the pace car at Darlington, then buzz over to a fundraiser for Democratic Rep. Ken Holland and John Jenrette, both of whom face tough opposition in November. It had been planned, Carter aides said, for weeks.

Then Sen. Bob from Kansas entered the picture. Dole, who had been dogging Carter's footsteps in previous days, decided he, too, would drop in on Florence on behalf of Jenrette's opponent, Ed Young. Damn, if those Republicans weren't trying to steal Jimmy Carter's thunder. In fact, Jimmy thought about forgetting the whole trip, cancelling it.

But that wouldn't have been particularly good politics. Even though Jimmy Carter didn't think that Bob Dole's tactics were particularly nice. And that is part of the game that Carter has played so masterfully since the days when a panel of celebrities didn't know who he was during an appearance on "What's My Line."

The poster of Ed Young attached to a chain-link fence at the Florence airport was strange. It made Young look very Jimmy Cartersque: khaki, open-necked shirt; a look of benign sincerity; even a resemblance to George McGovern. "The farmers need his help in Congress," the lettering on the poster read. "Again."

While Jimmy Carter campaigned in Darlington, Rosalynn appeared in Columbia.

The whole thing was well orchestrated. Girls, about 14 or 15 years old, were cackling, giggling and distributing elaborate Ford-Dole posters and hand-made ones with a drawing of the United States and the words "This ain't no peanut farm." Old men held the signs; children held the signs. So did women and girls. They were all standing in a fenced-in area adjacent to the Florence airport terminal (if it can be termed such), waiting for words of wisdom from Young, Dole and Sen. Strom Thurmond, who while the crowd was forming, stood in the terminal, shaking the hand of a black woman and looking totally unenthused.

This first gathering was not pro-Carter by any means, from the music that a small band butchered outside to the comments made by a very Republican boy in the crowd, who with a friend suggested they should have brought a carton of eggs to greet the former George governor. These two spent a few minutes scanning the airport grounds, looking for a place they could have hidden should such an assault have occurred.

At about 9:20, the crowd started pouring into greet Sen. Dole. The scene had all the atmosphere of a "Truth or Consequences" set. A couple of beauty queens (one of whom was Miss Florence of 1975 and who really starting rocking when the band broke into "Bill Bailey Won't You Please Come Home"), the Dole girls (Micki, Patty and Sharon), a lot of acne. And that insipid music.

Out of nowhere, the Northwest Orient plane carrying Bob Dole and his attractive wife Elizabeth began to circle the airport. The crowd, at the urging of a young man, whose hair looked like a freshly vacuumed shag rug, began to move closer to the podium where Bob, Ed and Strom would later stand. The plane landed. The band got louder. The applause continued.

The guy in the shag rug was still leading cheers when the plane stopped. "The Bob Dole Campaign Express" was emblazened across its nose; there was a 76 painted in blue, circle by red stars. The band broke into "When the Saints Go Marching In."

"You sing down here in the South, don't you?" the man in the shag rug screamed at the crowd. Obviously, he's no good ole boy. The singing never materialized; the clapping almost stopped.

"Here he comes," the man yelled over the microphone. "The vice president." And as Bob Dole made his way to the raised platform, every eye tried to catch a glimpse of his right arm; the one that kept him in the hospital for 39 months; the one that forced him to take his law exams by tape recorder; the one that has enamoured him to the bets of this nation.

On the stand, there was more of the Dole rhetoric. He called Carter's conservatism all talk; took endless swipes at the Democratic vice presidential nominee, Sen. Walter Mondale, saying, "Mondale goes to Plains to get his orders for the next week." Strom said a few words; the way he looked, there was some speculation that they would have been his last. Strom talked about Bob Dole's arm. One has to wonder if Bob Dole ever gets tired of his arm being a major campaign issue. Ed Young, who would look like an octopus if he had six more arms, said a few words. Nancy Thurmond just stood there, looking absolutely beautiful. Elizabeth Dole clutched a bouquet of roses and kept thanking everyone.

And that was that. Dole was shuttled off in a waiting car and the crowd turned its interest to a spot about 200 yards away, where Jimmy Carter was scheduled to land in "Peanut One" about an hour later.

There was an amazing difference in the crowd that met Dole and the one that met Carter. Dole's was clean-shaven, white and even a little bit nasty. There was no questions that Jimmy Carter was no friend of theirs, and they made no effort to hide it.

On the other hand, Carter's was younger, more diversified, populated by both blacks and whites. There were beards and mustaches, afros, wire-framed, tinted glasses. There was no one leading cheers, no one distributing fancy posters or signs. There was a human normalcy to the entire episode. Whereas Dole had been greeted by an amplified band of sorts, the Carter welcoming party heard the off-key playing of a high school band. They were there to see their hero. They didn't get much of a chance.

Tension rose as the first plane landed. He was coming. The famous smile; the smile so white and so broad that Wurlitzer should have been painted on his upper lip. The crowd edged closer to the roses. Then the United Air Lines jet made a quick turn, blasting the eager multitude with exhaust fumes, dirt and sand. Everyone waited in anticipation while the suited men and women, the cameramen and the Carter staff strolled down the stairs at the rear of the jet.

But no Jimmy.

Then came the second United jet, the one that held Him. Once it became apparent that Jet No. 1 held the national media, nobody much cared about it. All eyes trained on the front door of the jet labeled "Peanut One." All of a sudden, the door sprung open. There He was. You could see that smile a mile away.

A couple of men who had to be with the Secret Service yelled for the national network press cars, which would be part of the day's

Kirk Finlay takes on the traffic mess

By Bob Thompson

Kirk Finlay's law office on the twelfth floor of the South Carolina National Bank building in downtown Columbia would be an ideal place for a mayor's office. Across one side of the attractive, modern office is a picture window affording a panoramic view of the western side of the city. It is an impressive view, and one could hardly find a better place from which to visually keep track of the flow of life in Columbia.

It is an appropriate place for Kirkman Finlay, Jr., to have an office, because the young city councilman has a preoccupation with the growth and flux of the city. Since joining city council in the summer of 1974, Finlay, a Harvard-educated Republican, has established himself as an ardent advocate of city planning and has worked much more vigorously on that aspect of city government than have other officials.

Maybe the view out of his office window has something to do with his zeal for planning. From it, Finlay can see just how much Columbia has to improve, and he can see the vast areas of the city that, he feels are either misused or unused.

At late afternoon rush hour recently, we shared the panorama with Finlay, and he needed only point out the window to dramatize the increasing urbanization (and its attendant problems) that Columbia faces. It was 4:30 on a Wednesday afternoon, and the automobile traffic fairly oozed into and out of the city. For a metropolitan area of 250,000, Columbia has traffic problems out of proportion to its size. Part of that is due to the fact that Columbia, being situated on a river, has a limited number of entrances from the west, where a large portion of the commuter population lives -- in West Columbia, Cayce, Lexington, Irmo, and the Dutch Fork vicinity. The majority of employees who drive to work in the capital city's governmental agencies, university, and downtown businesses are funneled through the three bridges that span the Congaree River within the city limits (at Blossom Street, Gervais Street and I-26).

As we watched the cars and trucks inch along toward the city's bottleneck bridges, a huge line of vehicles began building up on the westbound lane of Gervais Street and, on the other side of the river, in the eastbound lane of Meeting Street in West Columbia, into which Gervais runs. A Southern Railway freight was passing through the city along the tracks near the Gervais Street bridge, aggravating the already bad traffic problems. The train stretched as far as we could see in either direction. The longest freights that run through Columbia are supposed to contain 140 cars, and this particular freight must have been nearly that long.

Finlay's attention turned to the riverside area of the city -- east of the Congaree, and west of Assembly Street. From our vantage point, it was easy to see how much of that land, which one would normally expect to be crammed with office buildings and parking lots and stores and apartment buildings, was lying unused.

Seaboard Park was visible about half a mile to the northeast, a green, hilly lot covering about six city blocks just behind the main post office on Assembly. Finlay looks at the area -- too unkempt and overgrown to fit the usual definition of "park" -- and launched into his vision of the future of Columbia.

"It's a very nice park, really," he remarked. "There are so many ways it could be used." The park is owned by the Seaboard Coast Line Railroad, which, along with Southern, owns all the railroad tracks running into and through the city. It is ideally located for governmental office buildings: a block away from City Hall, the federal courthouse just across Assembly Street, the proposed Strom Thurmond Federal Office Building under construction on an adjoining block. Finlay envisions it being a central part of the city-county-federal office complex in that area which he hopes will draw people -- and money -- into the northern end of the downtown area.

But currently there are several disadvantages to building anything in Seaboard Park -- indeed, in building anything in the "riverside" area between Assembly Street and the river. And most of the problems center around the railroad tracks that cross the western part of the city like a troublesome spiderweb. Southern Railway has three main tracks, and the Seaboard Coast Line two, that pass through Columbia in a generally north-south direction.

Columbia is certainly not unique in having railroad tracks through the city, but what is out of the ordinary is the number of lines through the heavily trafficked part of the city, and the degree of difficulty they cause. Because of the way in which the city developed, the tracks, rather than avoiding most of the auto traffic, which would be the most advantageous design, instead intersect the city's major traffic arteries at numerous spots. And there are very few railroad overpasses or tunnels to ease the traffic congestion in the inner-city. Twenty-eight trains a day currently traverse Columbia, and if you're in a car and in a hurry, you can be almost certain you'll find one of them at one or more of the five dozen railroad crossings in the city (not counting the numerous "spur" lines, which are less heavily traveled). Which means that you will sit, fuming at the idiocy of city planners, while anywhere from 18 to 140 railroad cars creep slowly by.

The disadvantages, wastes and even dangers of such traffic tie-ups are many. Besides the wasted gas as your car sits idling, the time lost if you are on the job, and the stress you may suffer, there are more compelling reasons to improve the flow of traffic. Emergency vehicles -- police cruisers, firetrucks, ambulances -- are not immune to the delays, and it is hard to tell how much property has been lost to fires and crimes and lives ended, because emergency vehicles weren't able to move quickly.

But don't fret at the planners who designed the city. There haven't been any such creatures for all intents and purposes. Columbia is an unplanned city, and that's the problem. Railroads were around long before automobiles, and Columbia, like most cities, grew up around the railroad tracks because of practical economic reasons. When autos first came of age, there wasn't much conflict between the two modes of transportation, because both trains and cars were fewer in those days. But as rail and auto traffic grew geometrically, little was done to avoid traffic conflicts; cars merely had to be content to yield to the trains. Now, the situation is at the crisis point, and worsening daily.

And don't think City Hall isn't aware of the problem. The city fathers, including Kirk Finlay, know that until something is done about Columbia's severe traffic problems, the city will be confined by them, and will be unable to grow as they hope. The facts are too much to ignore. For instance, the Central Midlands Regional Planning Council (CMRPC), a quasi-governmental agency that is consulted on most land use planning problems in the midlands, estimated earlier this year that Columbia drivers lose 25,000 man-hours annually waiting for trains to cross Gervais, Hampton, Taylor and Huger streets alone. That amounts to some 15,052 gallons of gas burned while waiting for trains.

The city council, along with Richland County Council, last year commissioned a $30,000 study of the city's railroad problems by the Greenwood engineering firm of Davis and Floyd, Inc. The study, completed last May, concluded that the city could spend anywhere from $26 million to $41 million to alleviate the bulk of its railroad-related problems. Davis and Floyd drew up six

The POLITICAL ECONOMY by Ed Meadows

There is an ominous trend apparent in American capitalism. It is the trend toward bigness, toward concentration of economic power. Small firms merge too frequently into large firms. Other businesses are gracelessly taken over by aggressive conglomerates. (It used to be that generally such takeovers were "friendly," accomplished with the consent of the directors of the firm being taken over; but this year has seen a large rise in "unfriendly" takeovers.) Business has come to mean big business in many instances, and the small businessman finds it more difficult to prosper.

There are reasons for all this. On the one hand, modern technological advances have created many production processes which are only efficient in large scale. Witness the classic example of the auto industry. If one set up a firm to manufacture cars on a small scale, he would have to buy the same sort of extremely expensive heavy machinery used in a large scale auto factory. Thus it would be purely foolish to establish such a plant to make only, say, 1,000 cars a year. Then each car would cost upwards of, for example, $20,000 each, to cover the expense of the manufacturing machinery. But if one buys the same equipment, more or less, and produces 1,000,000 cars per year, then he can operate at a profit, selling cars in a more reasonable price range. He can, in other words, spread the cost of all his heavy machinery over a large number of cars. His operation is efficent. The small scale car maker is inefficient by this standard. And this is what economists call "economies of scale."

Or consider government policy. Patent laws, for instance, encourage monopoly enterprise, because they grant one firm an exclusive right to produce a new product over a number of years. Since a firm, like Xerox, with a unique, patented product is protected, it will tend to become large and monopolistic, at least until other firms can come up with a reasonable facsimile of the Xerox copier without infringing on the firm's patent. Import tariffs also tend to create large firms. In effect, such tariffs subsidize a domestic industry at the expense of more efficient foreign exporters, who can produce the same product the protected industry makes, but with cheaper or perhaps more productive labor.

It can even be said that there is an inherent tendency in American capitalism for firms to become large. After all, growth is a major goal of every corporation. As it grows, it becomes able to buy out rivals, or to undercut their prices and survive. It is better able to carry out expensive research, thus to make its product more advanced and hence more competitive. As John Kenneth Galbraith has said, both good times and bad times are conducive to economic concentration. In good times, there's plenty of money around to finance mergers and consolidations. In bad times, it becomes quite easy for strong (big) firms to buy out weaker ones.

In 1776, Adam Smith, in his classic book, "...The Wealth of Nation," invoked the ideal competitive economy of small businesses freely competing with each other. In 1976, this ideal, always more a hope than a reality, is literally unknown in the American economy, unless one considers the illegal marijuana market. For the most part, ours is an oligopoly economy, characterized by a few giant firms in each major industry, setting prices among themselves and competing by advertising the dubious virtues of their products endlessly on television. Most of the products you see advertised on the tube are manufactured by oligopoly industries. Are there hundreds of brands of laundry soaps? Then they are all made by a few firms -- the Proctor and Gambles and the Palmolives. And if American businesses aren't oligopolies, they are what economists call monopolistically competitive firms, each with significant monopoly power (price-setting power), each selling a slightly different product. The only difference between monopolistic competition and oligopoly is, in essence, that monopolistically competitive firms are relatively many in number. Local restaurants are a prime example. There are a large number, but since each serves different qualities and kinds of food, each has a degree of monopoly power -- power which works against the consumer, for the monopolist never offers a price as low as he might offer if he weren't a monopolist. Finally, of course, we have pure monopolies, mostly the public utlities, the electric and gas companies.

But what is so ominous about this state of affairs? For one thing, an economy dominated by monopolistic firms is all too conducive to inflation, for none of these firms have any motivation to lower their prices. And in fact this year, business executives have begun to use such outlandish euphemisms as "price statesmanship" or "price leadership" to describe their unwarranted efforts to raise prices, thus to raise profits, regardless of the inflationary impact.

Worse than that, by definition, large, concentrated firms have the strong tendency to automate, to substitute machines for human beings. This may be efficient for the firms, but is it efficient for society when millions of jobs are lost in the economy? When, in order to achieve full employment, American industry needs to create 2,000,000 new jobs per year, thus to match the number of new workers each year, instead American industry's lust is to eliminate jobs. And the jobs that are left are highly skilled ones. But what of those people in our society who are unsuited for such work? Are they to spend their lives on a government dole?

It is just such a dilemma that's at issue in current negotiations between the United Auto Workers and the car industry, specifically The Ford Motor Co. The UAW wants a shorter work week, not because union workers are lazy, but so that more people can have jobs. The union's instinct here is a sound one.

It is feared by many economists that, because American industry has replaced so many jobs with machines, it may no longer be possible to have full employment without the artificial stimulus of a war or massive government jobs programs. If that is true, and if no solution is found, we can only expect to face in the not-so-distant future a large and understandably unhappy, perhaps revolutionary corps of permanently unemployed people, humiliated by feelings of uselessness, prone to violent crime, alienated from society in the most profound way.

And herein lies perhaps the most dangerous and difficult problem capitalism has ever faced. And the problem grows more serious every year, till one day a flash point may be reached. Let the presidential candidates stop talking about meaningless balanced budgets and start talking about permanent unemployment. ■ alternative plans for relocating and consolidating Columbia's railroad lines, and the city, with the advice of CMRPC, chose the least expensive of them. Little has been done since then, except that the city, according to Finlay, has been trying to get about $75,000 in federal funding to go ahead with more detailed planning. (Finlay says Richland County has "pretty much dropped out of consideration" in either planning or funding the railroad relocation, since most of the effects would be felt and the work done in the city.)

At first glance, the tentative relocation/consolidation plan seems like it may be a Kirk Finlay pipedream. It sounds too ambitious to come off, especially considering the city's fiscal tight-fistedness and the cost of construction today. The Davis and Floyd plan calls for the elimination of 37 of the city's 62 railroad crossings via the removal of several tracks, the construction of three railroad bridges (over Rosewood Drive, Whaley Street, and the intersection of Assembly and Catawba), and the building of seven tunnels under Huger Street. The net effect of the possible four or five years of work would be to combine the five main tracks running through the city into one corridor, with the two lines for Southern Railway and one for the Seaboard Coast Line, which would hopefully not interfere with auto traffic nearly as much as the current setup does.

The relocation/consolidation may be difficult to implement -- Finlay, its biggest backer, assures that "it may take an imaginative series of finances to do it, but it can be financed" -- but its advantages are one thing which everyone so far seems to agree upon. The major blueprint for city development, the Doxiadis Plan, was drawn up in 1968 by the international urban planning firm of Doxiadis Associates. The comprehensive plan outlines a 30-year program of reconstruction of the downtown area in order to avoid the inner-city blight that has afflicted most major American cities: the emigration of white residents to the suburban areas, the relocation of businesses in the suburbs, and the subsequent erosion of the city's tax base. One of the plan's major recommendations is the development of the area between Assembly Street and the river.

The development of the riverside area is also one of Kirk Finlay's pet projects, and it is inextricably tied to the problem of the railroads. That area, the city councilman told the Columbia Lions Club last July, "is the most valuable piece of land in the city at the moment." But unfortunately, at the moment it is also a hodge-podge of run-down government facilities, slum housing areas, decaying small industrial plants, and vacant lots. The streets are in atrocious disrepair, railroad crossings interrupt traffic frequently, and there are still a number of unpaved roads.

The riverside area is perhaps the most dramatic example in Columbia of the problems that inevitably ensue from a lack of city planning. Rapid, smooth traffic flow is an impossibility, partly because of the condition of the roads, but mostly because railroad tracks either interrupt many streets or make driving bumpy and hazardous. And that's in addition to the amount of land that is used for railroad right-of-ways -- land that could best be used for other purposes.

Efforts are being made to improve the traffic flow in the city, but like the development of viable residential and commercial areas along the river, the traffic flow too will have to wait until the most pressing problem -- the railroad tracks -- are taken care of. As Finlay gazed out of his twelfth floor office toward the river, he pointed to the cars backing up around the Gervais and Blossom Street bridges. "There's no problem with the bridges -- they're wide enough. The bottleneck is on this side of the bridges. The cars have no place to go."

If the need can easily be seen for removing some of Columbia's troublesome railroad tracks and consolidating the rest, financing the relocation and consolidation will be another matter. Finlay claims the $26.3 million which Davis and Floyd said the project will cost is a reliable estimate, including even an inflation factor. But how that money will be raised is still up in the air. Finlay was able two years ago to get the two railroads involved (Southern and Seaboard) to sit down with himself and Paul Cobb, then chief engineer for the highway department, to discuss the relocation, which Finlay laughingly said was a major task in itself. The railroads, Finlay said, "could not contribute cash but said if there were benefits to their operation, they were willing to go forward."

So the money will have to come from the city, state and federal government. Finlay is vague when asked exactly how much he expects to get from the city and state governments, saying only that he anticipates that the state Highway Department could possibly ante up a major chunk. But he says it could take four or five years before enough funds are available to complete the project.

It's a very promising project, and Finlay has had little trouble selling the idea to the various civic groups he has talked to. He has so far managed to assuage any fears that the city's taxpayers or businessmen will be stuck with the unenviable job of paying for the mammoth venture. "I think it's going over very well," he offers. Finlay likes to lay a good sales pitch on willing listeners, playing on the sentiments of Columbia's commuters. He pointed out before the Lion's Club, for instance, that "if you work it right, it's almost possible to be stopped three times by the same train driving across town." And, injecting a little more humor, he drawls, "You know, I once said the only people who are opposed to it are those who repair the front ends of cars or sell gasoline."

Columbia's city government has had a tendency in the past to work up a righteous fervor over land use planning, and then drop whatever plans they had or put them on the back burner when difficulties arose. Of course, that was before Kirk Finlay's time. But the young councilman has his work cut out for him if he is to prod the old-line leadership into action.

motorcade, to start their engines. And the media, local and national, raced for the buses parked next to one hanger. And Jimmy Carter, the candidate of the people, was whisked away.

That was the sort of day it turned out to be.

Courtney Stukes was supposed to stand up on the Greyhound bus at 11:10 and say "Attention."

She was a minute late. But it really didn't matter. She was not dealing with the Big Guys: The New York Times, The Washington Post, Newsday, AP or UPI. They were all on bus numbers one, two or three: they had to have representatives of the Carter staff with them. No, Courtney Stukes was dealing with the locals, who were on buses five and six. Rest assured, the local people had been told when they picked up press credentials, a representative of the Carter staff will be on every bus.

Therefore, it only stands to reason that Courtney Stukes was a member of the Carter staff. Wrong. Courtney had been called the Friday before to be a tour guide. She relished the opportunity.

"Welcome to South Carolina;" Courtney Stukes told members of the South Carolina media. "I will be shepherding you around today." And she wasn't kidding, as we'd all find out later.

Courtney Stukes proceeded to tell us of the immediate itinerary: going to the racetrack in Darlington, where Carter would zoom around in the pace car to the cheers of thousands. She told us to watch for the boys carrying signs that read "Carter Press Follow Me."

"At 12:20," she said, "the buses will begin to move. Please be on it. We have a very tight schedule." Then Courtney drifted into innocuous conversation with a reporter, discussing history and saying something about the parking problem at a local post office.

I couldn't help thinking what was going on in the minds of the news people on this bus. Certainly, they had expected treatment a little better than this. For it must have been something of a shock, to these people who had lorded over state journalism for so long, to suddenly be castoffs, pushed to the back of the professional bus while the big Guys were wined and dined by the Carter staff in the buses ahead.

But then again, these locals weren't covering the bush league type of politics that pervades the State House. This was it: the Super Bowl of the American Way. One had to assume that the green-and-black press badges issued to the locals would not end up in trash cans. Rather, they would probably be stuck in the corners of mirrors or pressed between the clear plastic sheets on a scrapbook; reminders that their bearers were, at one time, near to greatness.

The bus stopped, and Courtney Stukes was mumbling something out loud. She stopped before getting into the bit about following the boys with the signs. "Surely they won't need to be told again," she smiled to the newsman. "Aren't they bright, all these newspapermen?"

There were all sorts of races going on in Darlington at the speedway that morning. First, all the media people were racing to keep up with the guys holding the signs, who led us through a maze of Winston patches, CAT hats, STP stickers, gasoline smells and beer bellies to the infield. Then there were the camerman and still photographers, racing down the track to the chants of "Go, Go, Go," by the national media people.

One of the cameramen came over to the media people when hailed by CBS newsman Ed Bradley. "I always thought these things were done in Roone Arledge's (of ABC sports) basement," the man said to Bradley, screaming to be heard above the growling shouts of cars operated by Richard Petty, Bobby Allison, et al. "They never really happen."

And there was Carter, after formally shaking hands with Dole, speeding around the track with the GOP nominee and Strom Thurmond in hot pursuit. And there was the race itself. The stock car race. The Southern 500, a seemingly unlikely stage for a political play.

As advertised, Jimmy Carter rode the pace car and was cheered wildly. There was benign neglect for Strom and Sen. Bob; a nicely dressed man carrying a Ford-Dole sign was booed roundly. There could be no question: this day and this place belonged to Jimmy Carter.

While Carter circled the track, the media people stood around sweating on the infield. Hot? God, it was hot. The national media looked at once bored and amused. The locals, however, looked somewhat awed. They talked among themselves, why not? After all, there wasn't much of a chance to get close to the candidate, who was engulfed in wires and cameras and mikes. They talked among themselves and tried to look nonchalant as they strained to see who was with the national media.

Bradley was easy to pick out. He is a tall, impressive-looking black man who walks with an air of self-confidence and speaks with omniscience. There was David Broder of the Washington Post, looking like Wally Cox and appearing to feel strangely out of place amidst the funny cars, Southern drawls and oil cans. And Jim Wooten of The New York Times, in an off-green three-piece suit, talking on and off and having a generally devilish look in his eye.

To the locals, these people were heroes. The candidate sudden had become secondary, which was just as well. There were exactly two chances for the locals of getting to him at that moment: slim and none.

Much of the discussion on the infield, while the cars spun around us and the candidate milked the occasion for everything it was worth, centered on how we were going to get out. By this time, the race already was underway, and the thought of dodging No. 43 in the Dodge wasn't at all appealing. So all eyes remained constantly in search of the little man who would lead us out of this mechanized hell. The man screaming silently, "Carter Press Follow Me."

Like osmosis, everyone suddenly realized all at once that it was time to go. Jimmy Carter had done his duty, and the press will dutifully note it. Problem was, the men carrying the signs were going in different directions momentarily, causing consternation among both the locals and the national media. But all trails led to a tunnel on the other side of the track, much to the pleasure of most of us.

As we walked out of the speedway, it became apparent that we had become as much a part of the event as the event itself. Wandering across the infield, we were the center of attention, watched closely by the overweight men in Chevy tee-shirts and the well-endowed, halter-topped women. They were getting a first-hand look at the people who will try to make up their minds for them in the coming election. They didn't look exactly pleased.

They would smile, even wave on occasion. But their eyes seemed blank, distant, as if to say, "Just what in the hell are you doing here?"

Which, in retrospect, seems like a rather good question to ask.

Charley Mitchell, a wealthy Florence businessman, lives in a veritable mansion. It was at Charley Mitchell's where Jimmy Carter was speaking at a $1,000-per-couple fundraiser for Jenrette and Holland, an event that Dole wasted no time in criticizing upon setting foot in South Carolina.

There is a long, black fence that leads up to the mansion; a fence that was lined with people holding onto the bars and trying to get a glimpse at the royalty that would enter. A zoo in reverse. There was even a lake overlooked by a large porch. On the other side of the lake, there were four or five or six children, gazing at the proceedings through binoculars.

Unfortunately, candidate Carter was inside. The curious children got a look at media people stuffing themselves with greasy fried chicken, potato salad, cole slaw, Coke and fried chicken livers that looked like wrinkled brownies. But the kids didn't seem to mind. Again, we are like zoo animals to the normal people.

In turn, the media people outside the $1,000-a-couple dinner treated those inside in much the same manner. Everyone was trying to get a look at what was going on, who was there, what was being said. Only we were not exactly like zoo customers; rather, we were more like vultures, eagerly awaiting any leftovers from the political feast inside.

It was here, in this Southern castle, that we were first treated like people as opposed to cattle on the range. But it was also evident that the Secret Service men, the Carter staff and the hired help all had to be nice. They were painfully aware that we were part of the game, just as they were. For when we got on that bus back in Florence, we tiptoed that fine line between being a casual observer and being a casual participant.

And these people know that. That's why they were treating us like human beings at this stage. After Nov. 2, they probably wouldn't give any of us the time of day. Then again, after Nov. 2, we probably wouldn't ask them.

Interestingly enough, there had been little evidence of any competition among the national media. The dinner in Florence was a pool event, meaning that certain media representatives were allowed entrance, then would report to the other what went on. But sitting there on the veranda, waiting to be shoved back into that Greyhound, it became apparent that there was something more to this than mutual acceptance.

Coming out of the castle, the locals got their first closeup of Jimmy Carter. he's a short man, and has a lot of wrinkles. There is even a slight hint that his gray-brown hair might be starting to thin a bit at the top. He wasn't flashing that now-famous smile. In fact, he even looked a bit tired; maybe even bored.

But there is a presence about the man. He puts one at ease almost instantly; he doesn't exude power. One local television reporter was visibly shaking as he held the mike close to Carter's face and asked a question. The former governor answered slowly, directly, looking the man straight in the eye. By the time Carter had finished his answer, the man's hands had stopped shaking.

That says something about Jimmy Carter.

Then we all heard our master's voice coming from a portable public address system. It sounded like the voice in the Haunted Mansion at Disneyworld. Come along, kiddies, it's time to get back on the bus. Jimmy Carter was already gone.

While the families stared at us oddly as the buses pulled out of Charley Mitchell's place, Courtney Stukes said: "Hasn't this been a fun day?"

No one answered.

Back at the airport, we finally saw Jimmy Carter. All day long, the entire trip had been seemingly run by a computer clock. The trip was slick, impersonal; at odds with the essence of humanism that had marked Carter's arrival in Florence. We were shuttled like non-people on and off buses, following each other like elephants, told when to do what. Jimmy Carter seemed far away to most of us. Too far away for a man who went into the homes of New Hampshire voters during that state's primary and campaigned for their votes. Too far away for a man who wanted everyone to be a part of his family.

Always wallowing in a sea of television cameras, photographers, cords, wires and microphones, Jimmy Carter appeared to be very much the candidate he said he wasn't. He was accessible, yet he wasn't. His presence was felt, but the reality of it all seemed to vanish in the face of the event.

Then, back at the airport, after shaking a lot of hands, Jimmy Carter walked over to a black family that had been sitting beneath a large tree just off the airport runway. He picked a black child up and held him.

And he smiled. Not the same smile we had seen all day, but a broad smile. The type of smile for which he had become famous. Cameras clicked and whirred. People remarked about how cute it was; about how nice it was. Jimmy Carter was eating it up.

Smiling all the way.

CINEMA

ATLANTIC I THEATRE, 3220 Two Notch Road, 786-0790

"Devil Woman" and "Dragon's Never Die." R, with continuous shows from 2:20 p.m.

ATLANTIC II THEATRE, 3220 Two Notch Road, 786-0790

"Seduction," a new porn feature starring singer Andrea True, followed by the well worn "Climax of Blue Power." Shows start at 1:15, although some of the weekday matinees will be dropped due to remodeling.

CAROLINA THEATRE, 1223 Main Street, 252-80ll

"Survive" scuttles down the street. It's a budget exploitation picture about the South American plane crash and cannibalism incident. R. 1:40, 3:30, 5:20, 7:10, and 9.

COLUMBIA EAST I THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350

"The Omen." Gregory Peck and Old Scratch bump heads in this well directed but basically banal tale about the birth of the anti-Christ. Nervy Lee Remick thinks she is its mother, but ferocious Billy Whitelaw plays the nanny who tries to keep little Harvey Stephens from harm. Somewhat gory. R. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9.

COLUMBIA EAST II THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350

"Shampoo." One of last year's funniest films was this farce about a Beverly Hills hairdresser (Warren Beatty) who does more than his clients' hair, and thus winds up in the crossfire between Lee Grant, Julie Christie, Goldie Hawn, and Jack Warden. Clever, but with some more than shallow things to say about the lives of its rather superficial characters. Smartly directed by Hal Ashby ("Harold and Maude") with scripter Robert Towne providing his fine ear for dialogue. R. 1:30, 3:30, 5:30, 7:30, and 9:30.

DUTCH SQUARE NORTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110

"The Bingo Long Traveling All-Stars and Motor Kings." Billy Dee Williams, James Earl Jones, and Richard Pryor are barnstorming black baseball players in this enjoyable bit of vaudeville that features first rate performances and lots of nicely observed details from the Georgia locations. An all-black movie that is universal in its appeal. PG. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9.

DUTCH SQUARE SOUTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110

"Gus." It's Disney and brand new. About a mule playing to win for a college football team. Tim Conway, Don Knotts. G. 12, 2, 4, 6, and 9.

FOX THEATRE, 1607 Main Street, 254-5212

"W.C. Fields and Me." Rod Steiger as Fields and Valerie Perrine as his mistress in this adaptaion of the bestseller. PG. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9 with probable time changes during the week.

JEFFERSON SQUARE THEATRE, Jefferson Square Downtown, 254-6731

"Robin and Marian." Sean Connery and Audrey Hepburn recreating the Robin Hood legend. While there are moments of great beauty and poignancy, James Goldman's stagy, pretentious, sophomoric script ruins the picture. He traps the excellent Nicol Williamson in a bumbling, witless version of Little John and gives Robert Shaw as the Sheriff of Nottingham such lines as "he's a little bit in love with death." Still, you may want to go just for the ending, which is sheer cinematic poetry. PG. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9.

MIRACLE THEATRE, 1227 Main Street, 256-1950

"Tunnelvision." Television is such an obvious target that any spoof is bound to get some laughs, but this version of what the tube might be like in 1985 is about as crude and unfunny as a copy of Sick magazines. it tries to take up where "The Groove Tube" left off, however lacks the panache for scatological gags and so seems more like a leer than a smirk. With about two minutes of Chevy Chase despite the high billing -- the rest of the cast unknowns. R. Call for show times.

PLAZA III THEATRE, 1323 Main Street, 254-7960

"Infra Man." Another addition to the recent Sci-Fi boomlet -- this one supposedly concentrating on special effects. PG. 1:40, 3:30, 5:20, 7:10, and 9.

PALMETTO THEATRE, 1417 Main Street, 254-5800

"Ode to Billy Joe." Just what did Bille throw off the Tallahachee Bridge? We won't divulge, but most reports have it that it's hardly worth going to this Max BAer production to find out. 3, 5, 7, and 9 with matinees dropping during the week. PG.

RICHLAND MALL I THEATRE, Richland Mall, 782-2228

"The Sailor Who Fell From Grace With the Sea." Yukio Mishima's spare, poetic fable about a sailor who dooms himself by forsaking glory for love has been transformed into a slushy romance with little point or purpose. Sarah Miles and Kris kristofferson make love in the best of taste, Miles gets lots of misty, pensive close-ups, and Douglas Slocombe's camera dissolves across atmospheric seascapes that look as though they should be hanging on somebody's dorm wall. The movie is Muzak for the eyes. Rated R. 7:15 and 9 during the week.

RICHLAND MALL II THEATRE, Richland Mall, 782-228

"The Great Scout and Cathouse Thursday" stays for another week. A refreshingly venal view of the old West as a land of confidence men, crooked politicians and prostitutes. While Richard Shapiro's script is fairly raunchy, it's redeemed by Don Taylor's directon, which has just the right degree of exaggeration, and a fine set of caricatures by Strother Martin, Lee Marvin, Robert Culp, Oliver Reed, and Elizabeth Ashley. R. 3, 5, 7, and 9 with the afternoon shows dropping during the week.

"The Man Who Does Not Read Is No Better Off Than The Man Who Cannot"
